The arbiter of the weather was kind vesterday and turned out a brand of Thanksgiving Day that was as it should be when the thanks of the nation's first city are to be offered up without a tinge of regret because of the aspect outdoors. Yesterday was the kind of day that makes Washington a good place to come to and a better place in which to stay. It was crisp enough to make turkey palatable and give the proper Cape Cod twang to the voice that asked for more cranberries. A trifle warm for football, maybap, but still not so bad but that winter gowns were seasonable.

Connecticut and Pennsylvania avenues got their share of the day's promenaders, and last evening the latter street was crowded to the curb with sightseers.

The morning dawned unauspicuously behind a bank of gray clouds that seemed to promise much of the Prohibition element, but by noon it had cleared off enough to permit the city to get outdoors, with no qualms at leaving the family rainstick in the hall, hence the attendance at all the churches yesterday was extraordinarily large.

A great gathering of Masons from the Washington jurisdiction and near-by States was held in the banquet hall of the Arlington Hotel last night, when Temple Lodge celebrated Thanksgiving. The festivities of the evening consisted of a substantial supper served at small ables, to the guests standing or sitting in groups, or anywhere where two or three Masons were together. While the function was more or less informal, it was one of great enjoyment and fun.
